Nowadays people from all over the world have access to Internet, and therefore the ability to communicate with others anywhere. This speeds up the process of globalisation and makes starting a relationship easy. However, Internet devalues friendship with the possibility of starting or ending it with such ease. What is more important though, is that friendship loses its value when in the real world.

Like Aristotle said, being friends with everyone does not mean actual close friendship. The more friends a person has, the less value they possess. Not because it is a bad thing to have many friends, but because it becomes hard to maintain a relationship close enough to be called friendship. Of course none can restrict people in making friends, however it is important not to forget about ~~many~~ people close to us.

In conclusion, it is crucial for people to value others, especially the ones they love and are friends with, however being able to understand ~~who~~ can actually be called a friend and who is just a nice person.
